EUGENE T. KINGSLEY has sued the Northern Pacific railroad company for $85,000 on account of personal injuries. On Oct. 15, 1890, at Spring Gulch, Mont., while Kingsley was employed as a brakeman on the Northern Pacific, he alleges that he was on a flat car train, one of the cars of which had defective draw bars and irons, and while he was attempting to step from it to another car, the draw bar and apparatus pulled out to a distance of five feet, causing Kingsley to fall to the ground. He was run over by the train, mangled, maimed and bruised, so that both legs were taken off, the left between the knee and hip, and the right between the ankle and knee.

THERE are few railroads better advertised than the Canadian Pacific. Most of them
